Look Closer

One class period. Your students find what a business owner can't see.

I come to your classroom for one period. Teams of three each get a card describing a real business — a waffle window, a barbershop, a lawn crew two seniors run on Saturdays. Their job is to find the one thing holding that business back, prove it with arithmetic, and defend it to the room in sixty seconds. Then they find out what the fix would be worth in real dollars. I rewrite the businesses for your town before I come.

The students are working for most of the period. That ratio is the whole design.

WHAT THEY WALK AWAY WITH

"I could actually do this."

Not a definition and not a worksheet they will lose. One belief, earned by doing the work — plus three ideas that outlast the period: every business has one thing holding it back; being busy and making money are not the same thing; and you find the answer by counting, not by being a genius.

What I bring	What I need from you
I run the full period, start to finish	Fifty minutes of class time
Every printed handout, brought with me	A whiteboard and desks that group in threes
Business cards rewritten for your town	Nothing else. No technology required.

WHAT I DON'T DO

I don't sell anything to students or collect their information, and I don't spend the period talking about my firm. There is no cost to the school and nothing to sign. I come alone, I don't photograph students, and everything I'll hand out goes to you for review beforehand. I'll complete whatever background screening your district requires.

WHERE IT FITS
